In today's climate of financial difficulty and low employment opportunities it is becoming increasingly more competitive for graduates to find that job of their dreams. Employers are now looking at not only on academic performance and extra-curricular activities but specific transferable skills and essential work experience that give graduates the relevant skills, knowledge and leadership to be successful in the working world.

Time management, public speaking, and team leading are skills all graduates will find useful, and while some degree courses introduce these skills, they do not always offer opportunities to harness them. This lack of development has lead to the creation of a programme specifically designed to build, improve and encourage key skills for employability.

The University of Stirling Students' Union has created a programme aimed at benefiting students, employers and the local community. The student leadership programme launched this September, will allow students to develop their own skills, while assisting their peers and the wider community. The student leadership programme consists of three levels; Bronze, Silver and Gold, run over the course of three years.

Participants in the Bronze level will improve their time management, presentation and communication skills, culminating in group presentations to their peers. Silver level participants will harness skills gained from the Bronze level, and will go on to lead groups and develop projects within the University. Gold level leaders will have the opportunity to run a large project offering a service to the local community, using the skills available to them from their degree programmes.
